we can see it already in the change in the increase in usage of video conferencing. facebook and zoom have increased their utilization of video to communicate. i, for one, have never met anyone other than my family in the last few weeks, and video has been a great boon in communicating with them. it is amazing! i have also been taking advantage of this technology by utilizing this feature of instagram! you can ask me to do any number of things for you, and i will do it; especially video! on other platforms too, it has been an incredible tool to interact with people. instagram is amazing. i hope that as the pandemic is over, we will see a huge increase in the usage of video calling as well as video chat. while the actual technology has been around for a while, it has just been recently seen as a great way to communicate. technology is, of course, an artificial construct. there is no technology. we create technology and also populate it with real people (it is this that makes the difference). as a product manager, i like to think of this event as the start of the "democratization of technology." the modern world has really progressed through the utilization of technology. we have created three classes of people: those that can use this technology in order to increase their efficiency (and have significant leverage in doing so, at least initially), those that can use this technology to capture the natural experience that they are having (and will continue to have), and those that can sit back and capture the experience of this event. of course, the use of technology has already begun to increase in the daily life of everyone, including businesses. in fact, businesses have responded in a very interesting manner. i don't know if you've noticed, but when you are consuming any content online today, you are actually consuming it through some sort of hardware. you are streaming it through a set of devices. i have been trying to think what that means, and when i think about it, we have witnessed a shift. i started in a situation where most of my content was delivered to me through hardware i bought, or software that i wrote. when i take a look at it now, i seem to be moving in a direction where my content is delivered to me. i am receiving, more and more, content, either through the content itself, or through the link to where that content is delivered. that is not in all of my cases, but it is starting to become more common. if i am using a service like netflix, the content is delivered to me. if i am the jordan holloway convocation for this year was great, as it brought attention to the basketball program and the athletic achievements of the team, which have never been better. what i liked about this convocation was the willingness of the president and vice president to host this event on facebook. there was no voting. everything on this convocation was decided by the head coach jordan holloway and the athletic teams. it was a great convocation. michelle has a passion for helping and working with young adults and in her free time enjoys spending time with her nieces. she's a graduate of northeastern university and graduated magna cum laude with a bachelor of science in english literature. she enjoys reading books and watching movies with friends and family and enjoys spending time outdoors. rajeev is a fourth year student of the harvard extension school and works at the harvard university office of career services. he is a production assistant and student researcher at the science museum, manages the "harvardx" social justice programming network and recently finished an internship at the bostonmuseum of science. he grew up in krishnanagar, west bengal, india, and now works with the american indian science and engineering society as a student ambassador. he has been a member of various clubs and organizations throughout college and has participated as an actor in boston's longest running production of shakespeare's plays, julius caesar. he also loves spending time outdoors, such as visiting a local park, or visiting orchids at a local botanical garden. in his free time, he enjoys photography, writing, and football, and is an avid chicago cubs fan. 5ec8ef588b
